I have a linux based java application which runs in a network environment. The application is run by a user from any number of linux machines. The application is designed to work without using a database. Is there a way that this java application can also be run from one linux machine, but connected to two or more different devices? In other words, I want two users to connect to the same application (which is running on one linux server) at the same time. Is this possible? Thanks. A: Don't do this. Use a database (SQLite is tiny) and a server-side application with a datamodel that doesn't depend on a database or file - that's the simplest architecture. One component (the server) talks to the database. The other components (the clients) talk to the server. The server talks to the database, but is a "front-end" to the components (which talk directly to the data). Those components are: a gui program (an applet, web interface, whatever) "real" applications 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an apparatus for inspecting a semiconductor wafer or the like and, more particularly, to a controller capable of controlling various operations during the inspection of a semiconductor wafer by a video camera. 2.
